“ Our mother, Virginia Keim, was kind to children and animals.

She was a dutiful wife and devoted mother and grandmother.

She had a beautiful singing voice and often sang at her school assemblies. She even had early aspirations to become a professional singer and no less than lead singer would do.

She was hard working, intelligent and a voracious reader, even picking up and reading her kid's children's books when she ran out of grown up literature.

She was witty and funny and enjoyed word play. She kept her mind active by doing crossword puzzles.

She was a sports fan. Initially she watched Phillies baseball and in later years she branched out into watching Philadelphia Eagles football and NASCAR.

She enjoyed home improvement shows on TV and liked attending Open Houses in the Lebanon area.

In the 1950s and 1960s she watched a lot of war movies on TV in part because she admitted that the young men looked handsome in their uniforms.

She'd say she was not competitive but if you went out walking with her she'd be a half step ahead.

Last but not least, she played mean games of ping pong, badminton and cards and was a gracious winner and gracious loser.
